

History

The Mason Neck peninsula is steeped in natural and cultural history. Encompassing 1,813 acres, the park is bordered by the Mason Neck National Wildlife Refuge. Pohick Bay Regional Park and the Gunston Hall Historical Facility. Combined, these areas provide over 5,600 acres dedicated to recreation and wildlife management.

The first recorded history of Mason Neck was by Captain John Smith in 1608. He wrote of his meeting with the Dogue Indians and charted the chief’s village of Tauxenent on his map of Virginia. The area was referred to as Doggs Island and Doeg Neck originally. Later, the neck received its current name from the Mason family.

George Mason IV, author of the Virginia Declaration of Rights, built his home here in 1755. His Georgian house and outbuildings at Gunston Hall Plantation are furnished and open to the public for tours.

During the 1800s and early 1900s, logging was the area’s primary industry. The removal of mature pine and hardwood, and use of the pesticide DDT lead to the decline of the American Bald Eagle in the region.

In 1965 The Conservation Committee for Mason Neck formed to preserve the area from increasing development pressures. In July 1967, The Nature Conservancy made its first purchase of land to protect areas of Mason Neck until funds were appropriated to federal, state and local agencies.

The Commonwealth purchased its first parcel of what is now Mason Neck State Park in August 1967.

The park is now managed for passive recreation, environmental education and the protection and preservation of habitat for the American Bald Eagle and other animals in the area. Animals that frequent Mason Neck include: bald eagles, hawks, white-tailed deer, fox, beavers and over 200 species of birds.
